A message from lowell

It's reassuring to see the occasional athlete displaying good sportsmanship. While all around us we see, mostly, the lack of it. Tim Hardaway recently threw a television monitor onto the court. Latrell Sprewell choked his coach. Dennis Rodman.....where do you begin? How about Jason Kidd giving a fan the finger? The pouting, whining, spoiled, overpaid, self-aggrandizing athletes of today are the rule. However, there are some bright spots, like the wonderful reaction of Lea Ann Parsley, when she made the fastest skeleton run at Park City, Utah, with only one competitor left. The Gold was in her grasp. Less than a minute later, however, her teammate, Tristan Gale, made the fastest run of the competition, one-tenth of a second ahead of Parsley. Was Parsley disappointed? In one of sports shinning moments, Parsley ran to Gale, screaming for joy for her teammate. She was the first to reach Gale, and lifted her in her arms, hugging her, tears streaming down her face. Clearly, she was as happy for Gale as she would have been for herself.

Pat Summitt, the Tennessee Women's Basketball coach, showed real class when she went to congratulate the UConn coach, Geno Auriemma, after a bitter defeat in the final four. She and Geno had had a strained relationship prior to this, but they sealed a friendship at that moment. Apolo Anton Ohno, short track speed skater, was clipped and fell in the 1,000 meter race at the Winter Games, depriving him of almost certain gold.

Bitter? Angry? No, Ohno expressed gratitude and thanks for the silver medal he later won. He could have put in a protest, but said that the silver was "the greatest feeling in his life". And what about Steve Bradbury, the beneficiary and winner of the gold, who had never been able to beat Ohno's times before? He humbly accepted the award, admitting to luck, saying he felt it was more of a "career achievement" award. He didn't claim to be better, or the best.

Sportsmanship. Class. A disappearing breed. What a thrill to see true sportsmen and women in action!! They do their best to win, but feel great joy for those who can defeat them. Isn't this what we want to teach our children? Shouldn't sports be more about great performances than just winning? NIS has perhaps the best chance to help the right coaches bring sportsmanship back to sports. Let's not blow it!!

Lowell J. Grabau, Ph.D., Pres., NIS.
